The relationships between homology of the primary and the secondary responses to proteins of influenza virus, as well as between homology and immunogenicity of egg yolk were studied in mice. It was shown that the optimal level of homology of the primary response to the nucleoprotein of influenza virus was not only necessary for the induction of a secondary, but also for the secondary, as well as the tertiary response. When the primary response to the whole virus was lacking, a secondary response could be activated if the primary response to the whole virus was active. The immunogenicity of protein preparations from eggs was somewhat lower when the degree of homology with the primary response was higher. The immunogenicity of the whole virus was higher than that of egg preparations, whose protein preparations were less immunogenic.Effects of diph

Three student samples who varied in their previous educational experience were given the Reading Comprehension subtest from the Wide Range Achievement Test (WRAT) and the Oral Language subtest from the Math-Language Measure of Academic Competence (MS-ACE). The WRAT has been widely used by educators to provide a general estimate of a student's academic strengths and weaknesses. The MS-ACE is an experimental, written measure of the language, listening, and mathematics abilities of students, and is based on the performance of a control group of high school students. The aims of the study were to determine whether the new MS-ACE can discriminate between low achieving and high achieving students, whether previous educational experience influences performance on the MS-ACE, and whether the MS-ACE can successfully predict performance on the WRAT. Participants were 180 11th and 12th grade students from a high school in a large southeastern city. Data analysis revealed that the new measure is internally consistent and that the MS-ACE and WRAT are significantly correlated. However, the MS-ACE and the WRAT predict different aspects of a student's performance on test items. The results support the conclusion that the MS-ACE is a valid measure of an individual's language, listening, and mathematics skills which can be used to predict a student's academic achievement..content) 79a2804d6b
