My first impressions of the new Lightroom are mainly positive. I didn't feel any significant performance degradation, either. I also didn't find Lightroom 5 to be too heavy, too full of icons, or too complex. To be honest, I appreciate all of the features new to Lightroom 5. The new Adjustment Brush, for example, is quite expressive and user-friendly. Even if you're a seasoned user of the previous release, you might still find useful functions in the new version. Lightroom 5 provides a faster workflow, including the Import Processing tab, greater memory-leak protection, and time-saving sharpening options. The latter, in particular, is pretty significant. By using it, you can achieve sharp images, even if you're far from perfect. One thing I LOVED (got to use an exaggerated typing style to highlight it) about this new adjustment brush is the fact that you can use the brush to selectively undo brush strokes at any point. Prior to version 5, you could use the Undo tool to do so. In simple terms, it was equivalent to erasing the brush strokes from the image. This is quite different from the behavior of the Adjustment Brush. With the brush, however, you can create new ones to further increase the precision of your edits. You can also apply a brush over another one and simply paint over the top or lower it and even intersect it with other brush strokes. It's often as if you're using a paintbrush with a short or long fade distance. Once you can't see the soft edge of the brush or the brush begins to fade, it means you've reached the end of the brush stroke. You can easily restore the original now. A few small speed increases in my experience, but they weren't that important.

Although grayscale is a very neutral look, the colors fool your eye into thinking that all elements are important. But a black and white image only tells you what you can see; you need a hue of color to be able to identify an object in the image. What It Does: The Lasso tool allows you to make a freehand selection on your photo. This will save time and effort in your design. Symbols such as the text tool use the old-school selection tool to add text to your image, and have been refined. The Shadow and Highlight tools now let you get precision bezier handles, and the Brush tool in the Painting menu is fully customizable.
