How To Handle Manners In A Working Environment January 22, 2013 I am a firm believer that if you are smart enough, you are good enough, regardless of the size or the position you hold in life. I know that I have no right to be a boss, but I absolutely have the right to set my own standards, and I do everything I can to hold myself to a higher standard than most other people, and this includes 'manners'. I don't have to be a perfect manager, I just need to be good at what I do. Yes, manners are important, and in a working environment they are more than an acceptable part of someone's resume. Manners are important because they express the respect you feel for your colleagues, for the company, and for yourself. You don't need a formal email saying this, you just need to get in the habit of saying "Hello", "Thank you", "Good Morning" or "Good Afternoon" to someone you work with every day. I remember after I had been working for a while, I would have a client call me at home. When I would answer the phone, I would tell them who I was, and for some reason, this didn't seem right to me. They were my clients and I should have been answering the phone, not some stranger. Manners are important, and setting the standard for yourself is important. So, the next time you have a client call you at home, and you answer the phone and tell them that you are the maid, you don't have to be funny, you don't have to be cute, you just need to respect yourself. I have to say that when you live in a bubble, you don't get to see other people's personal struggles. This is a fact, and most people are aware of it. So, as a professional, you have to set your own standards, which means that you have to do the things you know that you should be doing. While I don't believe that there is a 'perfect', nor do I think that everyone should do the same things, you can still set your standards and make a personal change in yourself. This can be by talking to people, showing them that you care about their lives, and listening to their stories. This is what you should be doing when you see a customer who is in a bad mood, or someone
