Recent estimates peg the market at $2.4 billion annually for all senior housing. For the city's poor, however, finding affordable senior housing can be a struggle. The City has a huge need for senior housing with more than 18,000 households on the waiting list. Some neighborhoods, like the Tenderloin, have at least 30% of the households headed by seniors, but the supply is completely lacking. The senior market is as varied as the population of seniors in the City. The low-income senior has a different housing need than the wealthier senior, and a different need than the average senior. Many seniors do not want to share their homes with roommates or live in complexes. Instead, they want some or all of the freedom to live as they have in the past. There are many barriers to entering the senior housing market including income, type of housing (single family vs. high rise, etc.), and the rising cost of living. The City has an opportunity to create affordable senior housing for seniors throughout the City. In many neighborhoods, public funds could be used to create low-income senior housing, but a lot of seniors will not qualify. The state provides funds to the City for affordable housing on a per unit basis, but for very specific senior housing. Those funds can be used to create larger, permanent affordable housing complexes, but this will not solve the seniors' housing crisis. The City could create rental housing to meet the many seniors who rent in the City. The City could leverage the rental market to provide cheaper rents and great service to seniors 2edc1e01e8
