This can be done in two ways. Select the page to be converted using the file selector, and then type the desired page number. Select the pages to be converted by using the page numbers to be scanned. (In Windows, all the windows can be minimized in order to have a greater space to place the pages to be converted). - Multi-page documents, such as multipage books or long documents, are scanned by means of a built-in scanner. - The scanned pages are stored in the same directory as the file that uses them. - You can also provide a standard PDF file as an input. In this case the scanned pages are put in the PDF file itself. - The program creates an automatically generated document in the "Output" directory (provided that the directory has been set). - The resulting file can be opened by means of Adobe Acrobat. If Adobe Acrobat is not installed in the system the file is opened by means of the built-in PDF viewer. - The application is very stable, does not produce errors, and does not require any third-party components to be installed. - The scanned documents are displayed on the screen in the form of several windows in the same window, each containing one page. - All pages are in the same color, so that you can use them for both reading and printing. - The application allows you to specify the number of pages per PDF file by specifying a negative value (it is assumed that there are the specified number of pages in the multipage document). - The user interface is very easy to use. - The application does not automatically add bookmarks to the output PDF file. If the user of the application wishes to have bookmarks in the PDF file, she/he must manually add them. - The user interface allows the user to change the current directory. - The user interface allows the user to choose to open or to save the output file. If you save it, you can open the file later using the same folder and the same name. - There is a function of "grouping" of pages, which allows you to select all pages from the same page of the multipage document and merge them into one page. - At the time of writing, the supported languages are English and Russian. - In the future, we will continue to improve the program, so that we can add additional functions, improve functionality, and add new features.
