What's New In?

Hemodialysis (dialysis, hemodialysis) is a blood purification process in which waste products are removed from the blood by diffusion across a semipermeable membrane. The process can be used to treat certain conditions such as kidney failure. The definition of hemodialysis and the type of hemodialysis used varies from country to country. In the United States, hemodialysis is used to maintain or restore kidney function in patients with chronic renal failure and kidney damage caused by diabetes, hypertension, or other conditions that make the kidneys unable to function adequately. The hemodialysis procedure involves two parts. The blood is first removed from the body and directed through a machine that filters out most of the waste products, such as urea, sodium, and potassium. The blood is then returned to the body. This filtration process is repeated at least three times per week. Procedure A hemodialysis procedure can be performed at home or in a hospital or other healthcare facility. If performed at home, patients use a dialysis machine (dialyzer) to perform the procedure, which consists of two parts. A set of blood tubes called a blood circuit is connected to the patient's blood by means of a needle inserted into a vein in the patient's arm or leg. The patient sits in a chair or lies on a bed, while the machine, which is usually located in a separate room, is operated by a trained technician. In the first part of the procedure, the patient's blood is taken out of the body and put into a patient chamber. The blood in the patient chamber is then brought into contact with a dialyzer that is immersed in a dialysis solution. Waste products in the blood, such as urea, potassium, and other substances, are removed by diffusion across the semipermeable membrane of the dialyzer, and fresh blood is returned to the body. The two parts of the blood circuit are separated by a membrane that allows water molecules to pass, but not waste products. Each part of the blood circuit consists of blood bags connected by a flow of fresh blood. When the patient's blood is drawn from the patient's body, it is pumped into one end of the blood circuit. As the blood moves through the circuit, the waste products in the blood pass through the membrane and diffuse into the dialysis solution. When the patient's blood is returned to the body, it flows into the other end of the blood circuit. Continuing the procedure, the patient's blood is pumped again into the patient chamber. After a period of time, the blood is returned to the body. The blood pump is then disconnected from the patient's blood circuit. This procedure is repeated every three to four hours, and the patient usually spends approximately two hours of every procedure in the chair or bed. Hemodialysis is a relatively
