Would you like to be able to see the information from a lot of different sources? Would you like to be able to take notes, attach files, and even show your progress on GitHub without having to open the browser? You're in luck because a new application has been released that meets all these needs and more. It's called Ghostly. Ghostly is a special notification client for Windows that allows the user to see the information from GitHub, Twitter, Facebook, and Slack on their desktop. It was designed to keep the user up to date with notifications from these sources without having to deal with the clunky browser window. It also allows the user to create a custom notification time to help keep track of notes and messages. When logged in, Ghostly will also allow the user to manage multiple accounts and see the important activity from a lot of sources through the GUI. It's made to help with organizing and easily viewing everything. Of course, the user can also make changes to their GitHub settings to make it more customized if they desire. Ghostly is available for Windows 10 only,

The app offers an interesting look at how things work on Github, as well as their respective capabilities. There are a number of options here that can make this app even more useful. One can set alerts for different notifications, categories, or specific messages. By checking the boxes, one can set up an email, text message, or in-app notification depending on their preference. For those who prefer to be notified on desktop, there are a variety of controls for you to choose from. There are icons, text, number, and color options. When an option is active, it can be configured. For example, a user could set a notification to only appear when browsing that repository. If a user has an active notification on a different repository, there are switches to turn the notification off for that one. It's also possible to create groups of messages. By choosing options, one can set up a notification for all notifications in a group. This app can also filter messages based on keywords, person, or even repository. When the user is on Github, one can also choose to have their status and profile displayed on the app. One can view and edit comments, messages, or even archived messages as well. Note that this app will have all messages displayed in your browser's address bar. Github Description: GitHub is a web-based version of Git that provides for different ways to handle projects and code repositories, and is one of the most popular options on the web. GitHub currently has more than 20 million users, and is one of the major repositories for open source software. In addition to the primary source code repository, the company also offers paid plans for premium projects. With the GitHub app, you can view any of the repositories, create a new one, or perform a variety of other tasks. The app is a good choice for those who want to work with source code on the web. It's also a good option for those who want to make a project their own, and then publish it for others to view. GitHub offers a number of different plans for premium features, but those can be purchased independently. GitHub Description: With GitHub's app, you can view all of your repos, check your activity, pull requests, notifications, and manage users and organizations.
