Adobe says that the subscription plans have been improved to match its other subscription services. This means that whenever your subscription expires, your license vault will unlock, so you can reopen Photoshop and start working right away. In the past, you would have to wait until the end of your subscription, and even then it would be inconvenient to log in and access your content. Perhaps the most interesting (and symbolic) comparison is the apparent lack of concern with the iPad Pro in Adobe's title software—aside from the specific new features added in favor of the new tool, of course. Painter is nowhere near as powerful as Photoshop in terms of drawing, but Adobe does provide great editing tools for the iPhone and iPad. This announcement was a nice surprise given that Adobe has yet to officially endorse the iPad Pro as a primary tool to explore, edit, and create on. It's a nice compromise—especially for those looking for a new creative tool to complement their iPad Pro. Look for the iPad Pro and Photoshop Sketch to be announced more officially, and try it out for yourself. The power of Adobe's name and the ability to create documents on their preferred platform is significant. The content creation market is fiercely competitive, and the iPad Pro isn't the only way to create great graphics. It's hard not to be convinced, though—and Photoshop Sketch is a competition to work with for the iPad Pro.

That said, it's not all good news—and you have to choose whether that's a plus or a minus depending on your perspective. For my senior colleagues, the iPad Pro's 13-inch form factor and larger display will allow for more Photoshop-like content creation. That's also the biggest gripe for a lot of users who prefer the old PS traditional size document windows and user interfaces.

You will be able to go through all phases of the process much quicker.
