If you choose to work with individual colors, they can be retired, grouped together, used in new ways, or even blended into other colors. As you adjust one color, other colors in the image shift relative to one another. This is called the pixel-level editing that's available in these three options: After you apply these color changes, you can go back to the original image. If you've used the creative control tools, you may be able to see a preview of the effect you'll see as an adjustment to the overall colors of the photo. You can also use the blend tool to continue to modify the image yourself. Kicking off the effects in Photoshop are the blends. These tools let you change the color of everything, or only one thing by a certain percentage. You can also mix colors together. With the blends, the color matches the value of what is put in front of it on the middle slice, goes a little darker, or goes a little lighter—> depending on the value chosen. With the color blend options, you can also choose to add to the color or take away from the current image. This is all guided by the viewing panel and the two slider bars. The lower slider lets you add or subtract a percentage of the color to what's in the image. The higher one lets you go up or down a fixed amount of color. This slider is the same from frame to frame, as is the case with all the other slides. If there is something in the frame that needs to remain in color, pick that color, then use the lower slider to increase or decrease the overall color of the frame. If the frame consists of a ton of white, then the current color can be erased. e3d0a04c9c
