Something that is powerful enough would definitely bring the same level of quality and power to the final output. So, to keep your workflow smooth and organized, these tools must be powerful:

RAW Files – Digital photography originally meant capturing still images in RAW format. RAW is an uncompressed image format that enables more precise control over image settings than the standard file type – and when you shoot RAW files, your camera is able to capture more photo information in order to create a file that's larger than a JPEG file, has less noise and sharper colors over time. It is always recommended that you shoot RAW whenever possible. The file size is larger, and there is no loss of quality greater than what new cameras allow on the JPEG file size. However, newer cameras such as the new Nikon D3S with 36MP, the Canon 5D Mark III with 24MP, and the Sony Alpha NEX-7 with 12.3MP are able to capture RAW images that can generally be converted at equal quality to the JPEG photograph. When you're taking photographs of people and in dimly lit environments, having an extra stop of light is often critical. You'll determine the best exposure setting for your camera based on the type of ambient, and the amount of light available to you. Play with Exposure Settings – If you're taking photographs in a low light environment and you need to increase your pictures' exposure, the exposure settings on your camera can be adjusted in several different fashions. Zone Exposure – This method is useful when you'll be shooting outside and you need to increase the exposure in order to compensate for the lower light levels. To increase the exposure settings alone, you'll need to take an extra step – you'll have to move your camera away from the object you need to be lit. The Zone Exposure method requires you to move the camera a certain distance that will ensure your scene is exposed correctly.
