Levosimendan has been shown to improve haemodynamic function and the microcirculation in adults undergoing aortic balloon occlusion (AO) for open heart surgery. The study investigated the effect of levosimendan on the central haemodynamic and cerebral oxygenation during and after AO in children. Children undergoing aortic balloon occlusion and cardiopulmonary bypass (CPB) were randomized to receive levosimendan or placebo (control) in a double-blinded study. For measurements of central haemodynamics, intracerebral oxygenation and cerebral blood flow, a transit-time laser-Doppler flowmetry probe, an N2O/O2-based laser-Doppler spectrometer, and a laser-Doppler flowmeter, respectively, were placed in various territories of the brain. Central haemodynamics, intracerebral oxygenation and cerebral blood flow were measured at three time points: 1) at baseline, 2) during occlusion, and 3) after opening the ascending aorta. Groups were similar at baseline. The levosimendan group exhibited a better haemodynamic profile (increased LVdP/
