Folks who want to take photos connected to social media will appreciate the new Connect Services feature that lets you upload photos from iPhone and Android phones via the Services tab. If this is your personal target, it's probably not necessary, but it does prove that Adobe is serious about pushing the photo community towards cloud services. If you're a Lightroom fan, you'll surely want to check out the new free version, which has lots of useful and sometimes overlooked features. Better Lightroom 4.5 offers, among other things, a powerful new Search and Replace tool for photographers. New support for X-Trans RAW files is a definite welcome addition. The new Multivariate Curve Fitting feature and "Twilight" feature for Artificial Intelligence soon to be released add more variety. Creative Cloud subscribers get a preview of AI Plus in new Actions, Effects, videos, and Presets. A small but conspicuous improvement is the Recycle Bin, which now manages photos from your mobile devices as nicely as it does for documents. I've probably taken 3,000 photos with my iPhone. When I go to load them, Spot, Adobe's photo browser (I know it's not strictly a browser), wants to tell me which of my thousands are valid. While that's not a huge decision, it can be time-consuming. Normal albums generate a thumbnail for each photo in the batch. The more images, the longer it takes. I've lost count on how many days it's taken to get from the time I unlock my iPhone and go to the Apps screen, through apps, to the photos I need.

The Adobe Bridge makes it easy to assemble your photos into a cohesive, visually appealing, and searchable collection. Images can be sorted by library, color, date, and resolution. You can rename photos as you go so that you end up with a systematic collection similar to a set of files on a hard drive. The new GPS tool allows you to identify the location where the photo was taken and comes with a corresponding map. More power to you. Adobe Photoshop has a bevy of powerful editing tools that are available across the entire suite of tools. Users can choose from the Retouch tool, a selection of masking tools to correct and process their photos, as well as clone, resample, and warp. There is also easy to use clustering tools that can help organize your images for easy browsing, etc. Additionally, there's a new Content Aware Fill feature which uses intelligent content algorithms to quickly replace a missing area with a realistic color. Other features include the ability to add something more to an image with a variety of effects and various plug-ins. The new Content-Aware Fill is a particularly useful feature. You select a missing area of an image and click the Fill button to replace the missing area with whatever is in its vicinity. You can also use it to correct the appearance of duplicate objects and remove them. CS6 and afterwards, we've had the ability to create selections from the start of a new project. Previously, Adobe would turn off this functionality by checking its 'Enable Top-Down Selection' box (just before launching the camera). Now it's completely dark until enabled...
