Background: Chronic pain conditions are common in multiple chronic diseases and treatment for these conditions has been conducted for several decades, however, its effectiveness are still limited.

Objective: To assess the clinical effects of reflexology on chronic pain in patients with multiple chronic diseases.

Methods: Using a quasi-experimental design, this study was conducted in the outpatient ward of Sheng-Ming Hospital of Taiwan University from September 2005 to January 2006. A quasi-experimental design was conducted to assess the clinical effects of massage therapy on patients with multiple chronic diseases by randomizing them to a control group and an experimental group. The treatments consisted of a 60-minute reflexology session on one of two different points on the foot of the participants in the experimental group once a week for four weeks. Demographic characteristics, pain intensity, anxiety level and sleep quality were assessed at baseline and post treatment.

Results: Thirty-one participants were enrolled in the study. The experimental group showed a significant decrease in mean pain intensity on the McGill Pain Questionnaire. The experimental group reported a significantly lower pain intensity, an increase in sleep quality, an increase in relaxation and a decrease in anxiety levels. The control group showed no significant changes in all the variables.

Conclusions: The findings suggest that the reflexology intervention is more effective in relieving pain intensity, improving sleep quality and reducing anxiety than the control group.

Doing a web search for “reflexology” suggests two key themes:

1. The typical definition is a therapeutic technique used to relieve pain by stimulating certain points on the feet, hands, ears and scalp.
2. The more common usage is for relaxation.

The term reflexology is a combination of these two themes: it’s a pain-relieving technique (often used in massage therapy), plus the concept of promoting relaxation. In this study, reflexology was used in an outpatient setting to treat patients with chronic diseases. In general, with a perspective of the total effect of reflexology, the chronic disease of these patients may have some impact on patients’ reflex points, and thus the effectiveness of reflexology is lower than the expected effect. Hence, to remove confounding factors, this study only included
