Distribution of peptides in different developmental stages of lamprey lymphocyte subpopulations. We investigated the presence of peptides in lymphocytes of lamprey, a representative vertebrate, during early stages of its development. Lymphocytes of lamprey, comprising the thymocyte precursors and differentiated thymocytes, were identified using the mAb 1H5. The mAb 1H5 also reacted with epithelium of thymic lymphatic ducts in adult lamprey; however, the reaction was negligible in other lymphoid organs of lamprey and in developing thymocytes in chick and goldfish. The mAb 1H5 was also used to distinguish T and B lymphocytes in lamprey based on distinctities of cellular and humoral response to the mAb 1H5. Lymphocytes reactive with the mAb 1H5 (alpha beta lymphocytes) were observed in 2-week-old lampreys, and, by 4 weeks, they were distributed throughout the tissues. The mAb 1H5 reacted with plasma cells in many of these lymphocytes. Upon identification of lymphocytes as either T or B, alpha beta lymphocytes were also observed in other developing lamprey tissues. The mAb 1H5 recognized another lymphocyte population with prominent somatic localization on epidermal and dermal sheath cells. These cells did not react with the mAb 1H5, but they did react with the mAb OX16. This mAb recognizes an antigen shared between amphibian and mammalian platelets. Reactive epidermal and dermal sheath cells were observed in 2-week-old and adult lampreys, but they were diminished in 4-week-old lampreys. These results show that mature, functionally active T and B cells have been present in lamprey lymphocytes from the very early stages of its development. This invention relates to a device for interrupting and shutting off the water supply to a drain. Drain clog prevention devices of a variety of types are well known in the art. Most such devices are intended to provide a mechanical interruption and
