The world is changing in an exponential manner. We are moving faster towards an interconnected world. Nowadays, we can even start our day with the news we read on a mobile phone. We can connect with our family and friends in a matter of hours. In all of this, the final product simply becomes an afterthought to the work that goes into creating it. As a result, the problem is that when creating the digital product, the creator forgets to share the results, and eventually the creator loses all credibility. This is because the final product has no value outside of the creator of the product itself. This is not how the world is supposed to work. In today's world, a product is a product, regardless of who created it. In an interconnected world, this is impossible to achieve, and it is time for a change.

...it can be quicker to use the "Share for Review" feature than send JPEGs to someone to open in Photoshop or Lightroom. Perhaps Adobe should make it so that its image-processing quality is perfectly compatible with its own tools. If not, they might be better off separating the image processing from its editing tools. That might be why Lightroom has been slow to add some features that image editors have been using for years now. I'm not saying that Photoshop was past its prime in the past. I'm also not saying that things are all peaches and cream with the program. I'm also not saying that changes are not needed. They certainly are, but the way I look at it is that they must be thoroughly evaluated and thoughtfully done. Adobe should have checked the stuff it used to say had recently been removed from the list of the team's priorities in the past, like a lot of other companies do. How many times has Adobe added the ability to automatically or semi-automatically fix a blemish? Come on, let's not kid ourselves. The fact that there is a repair or erase feature in recent versions of Lightroom shows that Adobe now tries to do things in the right way. Oh, yeah, and where's the Photoshop Elements 2020 Release Candidate? Sharing options can also be set in advance and apply to all new shared reviews of this file only. To do that, navigate to File > New Shared with Reviewers. With the choice to share with everyone, if you want to share the document with a colleague and add their comments in one go, then don't worry! Open the new review and comments panel in the Photoshop app and add your colleague's email.

However, Lightroom doesn't offer as wide a range of image editing tools as Photoshop, and it can't do some things that Photoshop can, including create or manipulate certain types of images, or layer your photos. But the Lightroom catalog can be easier to use than the Explore tools in CS6, and you can export your curated collections of images to Creative Cloud catalogs, including online galleries like Behance and Dribbble.
